

About us:

For almost 125 years (yes, you read that correctly), NCJW has been championing the needs of women, children and families. And we're not stopping anytime soon.

We are inspired by Jewish values and empowered through our network of strong women. We speak out on a range of progressive issues, on both a national and local level. And through so many different paths of action, we pursue social and economic justice for all.

What we're currently working on:

Reproductive Health, Rights, and Justice

We're speaking out for health equity, reproductive freedom, and true moral autonomy for all. That means access to safe and affordable health care – including abortion.

Civic Engagement

We're sharing the importance of getting out the vote – and making sure no one is restricted from the ballot box.

Federal Courts

We're showing people how the courts affect every aspect of our lives – and making certain that judges with lifetime seats on the bench are committed to upholding constitutional values (including reproductive rights).

Israel

We started the first ever Women and Gender Studies program at Tel Aviv University. And now, we're fighting for religious and gender equality across the land – and working to get women into the seats of power.

How we take action:

Lobbying in DC and locally, calling our elected officials, participating in intersectional coalitions across the country, starting and signing petitions, creating and sharing social media action campaigns, taking part in awareness days, educating others through events/ action kits/news, marching in the streets, and SO much more.
